TOWN HAS EVERYTHING YOU NEED IN LIFE | AND AFTER

Cary's population has greatly increased in recent years, and eventually those new people will need a final resting place. Hill Crest Cemetery, above, is the only public cemetery in Cary now, and all its plots have been spoken for.

Cary had its housing boom. The shopping centers followed. Now it's time to start developing six feet under.

A new privately funded and operated cemetery called Wake Memorial Park has received preliminary approvals from town and state officials to open off Green Hope School Road and N.C. 55 near Sears Farm Road.

The development is another sign of Cary's staggering growth in recent decades. The only other option for Cary residents who do not have access to a family or church cemetery is the historic Hill Crest Cemetery, a public cemetery near Kildaire Farm Road. However, all the space in that cemetery, which the town maintains, has been spoken for for more than a decade. There's even a waiting list of 55 people, said Sue Rowland, the town clerk.

"This is just one more thing the town needs to provide for its citizens," said Cary Mayor Glenn Lang.

Site plans for the new cemetery still have to be approved by the town, and the state Cemetery Commission still has to license the operators. If all goes as planned, though, the cemetery will be open for business, either for families to buy plots or for burials, by the first quarter of next year.

Initial plans call for the cemetery to include more than 20,000 plots, a mausoleum and two columbaria, where cremated remains in urns can be placed. The number of plots could reach 100,000.

The cemetery will have ponds, landscaped gardens, walkways, courtyards and an entrance lined with cherry blossom trees. Although about 50 acres are being set aside for the cemetery, initially only 30 acres are going to be developed.

"I want people to feel comfortable about coming out here and having a picnic next to their grandmother's grave," said Terilyn C. deMarsi, a 14-year veteran of the funeral home and cemetery industry. DeMarsi had the idea for the cemetery in 1999 after realizing the town had nothing to offer families who wanted to bury a family member in Cary.

DeMarsi declined to say how much will be spent to build the new cemetery, which eventually could include an on-site funeral home. But burial costs will be competitive with other cemeteries throughout the region. Packages, which usually include husband and wife side-by-side spaces, burial vaults and flat bronze headstones, generally run between $5,700 and $8,000.

The cemetery is a lifelong dream for deMarsi, who said she has held management positions at funeral homes and cemeteries throughout the nation.

After she had the idea, she began approaching developers in the area, looking for a partner in the project. Cary developer's Mike Hunter and Kyle Ward, owners of WW Partners, which developed Carpenter Village in Morrisville, saw the potential in the plan and teamed up with deMarsi.

"We felt that this was a needed thing in the community," Hunter said. "And it was a good opportunity for diversification for us."

DeMarsi then began working to get the necessary land, a process that included going door-to-door to more than 200 homes around Cary and Apex trying to find a family who not only was willing to sell but also had enough land to accommodate the cemetery.

Cary resident Bill Upchurch and his family were willing to partner in the project with their land, which up until just three years ago was a tobacco farm, off Green Hope School Road.

"I hope it's something that we'll leave to serve a need for the people in the town of Cary," Upchurch said. "I probably wouldn't have sold the land if it wasn't for this."

Lang said when the property came up for a special use permit last month, it met with no community resistance, a fairly rare occurrence with new developments in Cary. "I think it shows everybody understands the need here," he said.

The state hasn't licensed a cemetery that is open to the public in Wake, Orange, Johnston or Durham counties for more than three decades. However, privately run church and family cemeteries have been built.
