You mention the fact that I am the first descendant of Paschal B Upchurch from whom you have heard. I suspicioned that. In all my research I found nothing that would indicate any research from any member of my family, present or past. I am glad ot furnish records from Paschal B to the present.

Again, let me say that Paschal
B Upchurch was a soldier in the Civil War and was fatally injured On July 4, 1863 at the skirmish, or battle at South Anna River Bridge over the RF&P Railroad. For a long time I did not have this info. in my research I found him in the 1860 Fed Census, but not in the 1870 Census. It was obvious that something had happened to him between 1860 and 1870. I found Talitha Upchurch & her children in the 1870 Census. Research at the NC Archives confirmed my suspicions, proven by my finding records of his death. I later learned of his parentage and ancestry – part of the thrill of genealogy. I am glad that I am able to add the Paschal B descendants to your records.

(14) Extract from letter 30 Nov 1995 Harold Vernon Nelson, Jr to RPU – regarding his efforts to locate the burial place of his great grandfather – P B Upchurch.

In answer to a query in Southern ??? some time ago, seeking P B Upchurch burial info. I was fortunate to have received an answer from someone who lived about 3 miles from battle site and had done research about the incident. Through him cemeteries at Richmond, Fredricksburg and Ashland, all in VA, were checked but to no avail, however, all had numbers of unidentified Civil War graves. Due to damage to railroad it is doubtful that any effort was made to move the remains to any of these. At Taylorsville Baptist Church, located about 1 1/2 miles from site of battle, one buried several unidentified Civil War vets. I presume that PR Upchurch is buried there. Church records for that period of time have been lost, that is if they – the burials, - were ever recorded.

EXPEDITIONS TO THE SOUTH ANNA RIVER

( Hanover Courthouse - Ashland Station - South Anna River )

Lee's Supply Line Is Saved

June 26 and July 4, 1863

A more successful attempt was made to destroy the railroad bridges over the South Anna River in late June. The Federal cavalry involved was comprised of eleven companies of the 11th Pennsylvania of Lieutenant Colonel Hasbrouck Davis, who was familiar with the area from the raid conducted in May, and a detachment comprised of men from the 12th Illinois and 2nd Massachusetts, in all about 1,050 men, all under the command of Colonel Samuel P. Spear. This force began its raid from White House in the early morning hours of June 26, riding to Tunstall Station. From there, Spear proceeded along the south bank of the Pamunkey River until he reached Hanover Courthouse, where he burned and ransacked a train and depot, which contained a large quantity of food and supplies. He then proceeded to the Virginia Central Railroad bridge over the South Anna River, where forty men of the 44th North Carolina awaited him, about 11:00 A.M..

The 44th North Carolina had been in transit from their home state to northern Virginia. Upon their arrival in Richmond, they were sent immediately to relieve Brigadier General Montgomery D. Corse's brigade of Pickett's division. Corse's brigade had been left behind by Longstreet, while en route from Petersburg to join Lee, with orders to protect the Junction and railroad bridges north of the city in Hanover County. Colonel Thomas C. Singletary, the regiment's commander, and two companies remained at Hanover Junction, while Major Charles M. Stedman with four companies guarded the bridges north of Hanover Junction. The remaining railroad bridges over the South Anna and Little Rivers south of the junction were placed under Lieutenant Colonel Tazwell L. Hargrove, who placed one of each of his four companies at each bridge. Hargrove remained with Company A, led by Captain Robert L. Rice, at the Virginia Central Railroad bridge over the South Anna.

Hargrove, who was behind breastworks on the south bank of the river, fell back across the bridge after Spear's arrival and prior to his initial assault, as the entrenchments at that end of the bridge were not defensible by so few men. From his new position on the north bank of the river, Hargrove fended off numerous frontal assaults, fighting gallantly for over an hour from behind trees and bushes. Spear, unable to gain the bridge with frontal assaults, sent between 300 and 400 men upstream, where they forded the river and proceeded to surround Hargrove. About that time, forty men of Captain Robert Bingham's Company G, 44th North Carolina, arrived from the railroad bridge over the Little River near Taylorsville, four miles distant. This caught the flanking Federal cavalry off guard, resulting in their temporary withdrawal. Two other unsuccessful charges were made against Company G, now behind the breastworks on the north bank of the river, about 200 yards from the railroad bridge. More Federal cavalry crossed the river, and as Spear's men struck Rice's flank at the bridge abutment and became intermingled with Hargrove's men in hand to hand combat, Company G was unable to fire. This allowed Spear's men to capture most of Company A, while Company G could only watch helplessly. Company G soon found themselves surrounded, and realizing the futility of continuing against such overwhelming numbers, surrendered. Spear then burned the bridge, remaining until the last burning embers fell into the river below.

After the bridge was destroyed, Spear sent a scouting party toward the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad bridge near Ashland. The Federal cavalry that approached the bridge north of the river was met by Captain L.W. Allen's cavalry company, and was forced to retire back across the river where they rejoined Spear. The scouting party reported the bridge defended by Colonel T.C. Singletary and three infantry companies, also of the 44th North Carolina. Since it had taken almost four hours to take the first bridge, Spear concluded that his presence and purpose was known, and, as evidenced by the report of his scouting party, the enemy had had ample time to prepare their defense of the remaining bridges. Spear decided to assemble his captives and return to White House.

Colonel Hargrove, himself wounded at least four times, was among those captured. Spear, confronting Hargrove asked, "Colonel Hargrove, where are your men?" Hargrove replied, "I had only eighty at first and these are what is left of them." To this Spear responded, "It was reported to me that there were at least four hundred infantry in those breastworks. Colonel Hargrove, you have ruined my reputation. I came here to destroy all four of the bridges and the Junction, and I must retreat after burning only one bridge, and capturing only this handful of men. Your resistance is the most stubborn known to me during the whole war."

Besides Hargrove, Spear's expedition also returned with another captured "gem". Brigadier General "Rooney" Lee, Lee's second eldest son, also was taken prisoner. As with Wickham the previous year, Rooney Lee was captured at Hickory Hill while recuperating from a leg wound he received in the cavalry fight at Brandy Station earlier in the month. Leaving the severely wounded rebels behind, Spear set out for White House. Returning through Hanover Courthouse, New Castle, and King William Courthouse, Spear arrived at White House on the morning of June 27.

Singletary reported 5 killed, 19 wounded and about 50 of his men captured. Captain Allen lost two men. Companies A and G, 44th North Carolina, lost 9 killed, 13 wounded and the majority captured. Federal losses according to rebel reports were 6 killed, 13 wounded, and 1 captured. Although Spear's mission was a successful one, Lee still had one link with Richmond.

After Spear's return, another expedition was quickly organized to neutralize the remaining railroad bridge over the South Anna. Lee was in Pennsylvania, and this was an important link in his line to Richmond. The expedition was placed under the command of Brigadier General George W. Getty. With Spear's report in hand of the fortifications at the bridge, Getty organized a force of about 10,000 men, consisting of Getty's own 2nd Division, 7th Army Corps, less the 21st Connecticut, two regiments under Colonel David W. Wardrop, Brigadier General Robert S. Foster's five regiments with Captain Phineas A. Davis' 7th Massachusetts battery, and Colonel Spear's 11th Pennsylvania Cavalry with five small companies of the 2nd Massachusetts Cavalry.

Getty's large force left White House July 1 at dawn and camped that night at King William Courthouse, while Spear camped at nearby Brandywine. The next day the expedition moved to Brandywine and then to Taylor's Ferry on July 3. On July 4, Getty left the 2nd Brigade, 2nd Division, 7th Army Corps under Colonel Griffin A. Stedman Jr., along with James Gilliss' and John G. Simpson's batteries, at Taylor's Ferry, and advanced to Littlepage's Bridge. Leaving the 3rd Brigade, 2nd Division, 7th Army Corps to guard the crossing there, Getty crossed the Pamunkey River and occupied Hanover Courthouse, scattering the rebel pickets found there. Colonel Samuel M. Alford, commanding the 1st Brigade, 2nd Division, was left at Hanover Courthouse, and the remainder of Getty's force moved toward the remaining railroad bridge over the South Anna River, Spear's cavalry leading the way.

Spear arrived at the bridge, a wooden trestle about one hundred yards long and seventy feet high at the center, about 6:00 P.M. He drew immediate fire from companies of Colonels E.J. Hall's and William MacRae's regiments of Brigadier General John R. Cooke's North Carolinian brigade. The defending companies were commanded by Major A.C. McAllister. Spear dismounted and waited for General Foster's anticipated arrival, which came about 7:30 P.M. Foster did not respond to the three pieces of rebel artillery, which were totally ineffective, as he did not want to reveal his position. Information gathered from nearby citizens indicated that the bridge was defended by as many as 8,000 men, far more than Foster or Getty had expected.

This was due in part to the failure of Major General Erasmus D. Keyes' 4th Army Corps to convincingly demonstrate against the rebel defenses east of Richmond near Bottom's Bridge and Baltimore Crossroads, held by two brigades under the command of Major General D.H. Hill. This feint was made July 1 in hopes of drawing men away from the railroad bridge north of Richmond, leaving the bridge lightly defended and therefore vulnerable to Getty's attack. However, Keyes failed to press the attack and his withdrawal the next day to White House allowed Hill to send reinforcements to the bridge.

Foster sent Major George F. Nichols with two companies of his 118th New York and one company of the 99th New York as skirmishers, to ascertain the true defender strength at the bridge. They were repulsed twice, but did capture ten men. After interrogating the captured men, Foster decided that the bridge was too well fortified to take, so he ordered track in the area torn up instead. This was done for a distance of three miles below the bridge. Foster reported the situation to Getty who had remained at Hanover Courthouse, and awaited further instructions. Getty, seeing the futility of the situation, ordered Foster's withdrawal, which began about 2:30 A.M., July 5.

Meanwhile, during the afternoon of July 4, Getty had sent Major Franklin A. Stratton and a squadron of the 11th Pennsylvania Cavalry to locate and destroy a bridge across the North Anna reportedly four or five miles above Littlepage's Bridge. Upon his return at 8:00 P.M., Stratton was sent with Companies G and M, 11th Pennsylvania Cavalry to destroy Ashland Station on the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad. He arrived at the station at 1:30 A.M., and proceeded to destroy track, telegraph lines for a half mile, railroad buildings and property, burned a trestle a mile south of Ashland, and carried off the telegraph machine. He returned to Hanover Courthouse and rejoined the main force at 6:00 A.M.

An hour after Foster's arrival, Getty's expedition crossed the Pamunkey River, burning Littlepage's Bridge behind them. They arrived in White House on July 7. Getty reported 2 killed, 10 wounded and 4 missing. Confederate losses, as reported by Cooke, were 1 killed and 6 wounded.

Although the expedition failed to destroy the Richmond, Fredericksburg and Potomac Railroad bridge over the South Anna, it was not a total failure. Communications and rail service were disrupted. Ralls, becoming increasingly harder to locate, had to be replaced, and soldiers would go hungry for lack of food destroyed in the raid. The rebel "victory" in holding the last bridge on the South Anna became of less significance when word arrived of Lee's defeat at Gettysburg and his return to Virginia.

Silence once again settled over the Hanover countryside. The Federals once again were gone. The silence lasted until early in 1864, when the thunder of opposing guns would announce the war's return.
